FOR THE REPALD. BY AN OLD CONTRIBUTOR.

'Tit the first fall of the beautiful-

The first mantle of snow—
A premonition of biting want, A winter laden with woe

What is there in it that's beautiful-This hateful, scurrying, blinding snow? To the poor, alas! it is pitiful, As hurrying to labor they go.

Another fall of the beautiful-

What an error poets make! Say rather it is detestable. There's naught but siush in its wake.

The crepitant sound of the grinding heel

Strikes terror to many a heart; It tells of the pangs the wretched feel, Of this weary world so great a part. To the great it may be beautiful.

A season in which they pride, With champing steed and tinkling bell, And a dashing moonlit ride. Another fall of the beautiful-A room that is cheerless and cold,

A weeping mother, a hungry brood-A Shylock demanding gold Another fall of the beautiful,

Yes, another message of woe. To her of the torn shawl and ragged gow And the shoe bereft of a toe.

Oh, why do you call it beautiful, Wno labor hard for scanty meals.

The Devil of money is abroad to-night, His step is loud on the tenement stair ; He clutches with glee the widow's mite. Nor lists to her piteous prayer.

Eviction, too, is a part of his plan, Though the world is mantied in snow : He has no mercy on woman or man, But gloats as his millions grow. Then say no more it is beautiful-

We are all too fond of tinsel and show, When the poor are happy and content, We may smile at a fall of the snow. Obituary.
